

“Hundatora”

Gwynn Paulett (August 2016)

Seven 'Devon Dowzers' met in the Hound Tor car park with rods in hand and backpacks on, ready for the walk to the medieval village of Hundatora. Walking eastward towards Hound Tor took us through the “avenue” of granite at its summit and down the hill to the abandoned medieval village.

There was a peacefulness about the village in the present: walls of long houses, gardens, and store houses evident. Sally and I dowsed for the windows of the long houses which readily revealed themselves. Anglian Windows would have been proud of us!

Steve was picking up energy lines running through the village and Julie and Pam were busy dowsing dates of occupation, which included the Knights Templar. This village was “protected” by rich benefactors who were supporters of the Knights Templar. Much more interesting history was revealed through their dowsing but as Paul and Angie acknowledged, the horizontal rain that swept down from Hound Tor made conditions impossible for dowsing so we retreated to the car park agreeing that the site had a great energy and that Devon Dowzers needed to return at an early opportunity.
