

Sound Essences and Vibrational Energy

A Zoom talk to the Devon, Tamar, Trencom, Somerset and Thames Valley Dowsing Groups

by Evelyn Mulders

If ever there was a good demonstration of the application of information transfer across dimensions, this was it.

Canadian therapist, Evelyn Mulders, started her career as an engineer - but in the days when it was difficult for a female engineer to be taken seriously, she soon switched to engineering subtle energies instead. Her progress from interested questor to fullyfledged practitioner is a good tale in itself, full of unexpected twists and turns - as if it was 'meant to happen'. While there is always an interesting debate about what is potential, what is chosen and what is causative, the upshot in this case is that Evelyn has become an established and respected purveyor of essences across the western world.

Her system involves the capturing of energy vibrations into a carrier substance, which can then be transmitted to the end user by a mister (spray). In practice, this has many similarities with other systems that involve the homeopathic concept of transferring beneficial information through a process that effectively eliminates any original matter.

Evelyn echoes Albert Einstein's well-known catchphrase that 'everything is energy'. She notes that light and sound energy are only octaves apart, but on the same spectrum, and that both waveforms have been shown to improve wellbeing, at least under certain circumstances.

Her journey was to find a way of literally 'bottling' this benevolence in a manner that enables a client to use it in their own locality. Starting small, with just family and friends, she gradually developed her system until it grew into a substantial business, based on a simple series of layers of self-analysis.

The operation of the process itself will be familiar to dowsers, in that it addresses each of the five 'dimensions' (in this case, called Meridians, Chakras, Aura, Torus and Hologram) of the client's persona in turn - and then uses a fan-shaped card to determine the precise formula required to address the primary shortcoming at each level.

Once determined, the client sprays the specified mist around their upper chakras and then returns to the fan with their pendulum to assess the impact. It is not always possible to get to 100% wellbeing in any situation, but it appears that most people will see at least some benefit from this procedure at each level. Sometimes the system works well enough to imply complete harmony, and these result in Evelyn's pendulum rotating excitedly in a 'happy dance'.

Evelyn pays tribute to the work of Dr Masura Emoto, who gave a degree of credence to healers such as herself by demonstrating that thoughts appeared to be capable of transference to water (and then displayed physically as different shapes and patterns in ice crystals).

About a decade ago, Evelyn gave a workshop at a British Society of Dowzers Conference - and this was clearly a seminal moment in her career. She was enthused, to see a group of established dowzers from outside of her own community taking her developing system seriously, and then putting it into practice. It was a genuinely exciting experience for her.

Although clearly operating a burgeoning business, Evelyn is generous in sharing her findings - and much of the information that underpins it. She has a wealth of testimonials from satisfied customers, and was even willing to give a keynote finale to her own talk.

Live online, she measured the level at which the group could benefit from the process, established the appropriate 'mist' to send out - and liberally sprayed it around her own screen, casting the information into the ether as she did so. In a demo that gleefully sidelined space, time and mainstream science, she sent out a boost to our collective wellbeing. Several of those participating unmuted to say that they had felt something beneficial - and, in at least one case, even smelt something. EM seemed pleased, but not phased. It is clearly a reaction that she often gets - but a bit of positive feedback is always welcome!

Many thanks to Evelyn for this enjoyable and uplifting presentation, which from the discussion that followed, clearly hit a sweet spot with many of those present.
